
Visualarq For Rhino 5 Latest REAOKAL

A: It seems the issue lies with VisualARQ not updating the Rhino view state with the page layout as it's saving the current state. I've just upgraded VisualARQ and the issue is now resolved.

Q: Delete a row after PostgreSQL's autovacuum isn't finished I have the following situation. I have several tables, let's call them T1, T2,..., T100. Each of these tables contains a lot of data. And there's something like a "policy" which decides, if a table would be deleted or not. If this policy is "keep it" then each table keep the data. If it's "delete" then it's auto deleted, and that's OK. The problem is, that the system needs to delete the tables somehow, when autovacuum can't finish. It means, that it needs to skip the "delete" phase, and just delete the data. How I can do it? I can't just truncate the tables or something like that, because the last operation to do is some report calculations. Of course I can kill the auto vacuum daemon, but this is something which should be very rare. The best option I can think of, is to write a postgres trigger on every tables. And run there a for loop where I delete the records one by one. This probably won't scale, but I don't know any other options. If my question is unclear, or there's any other info I should give, let me know. Btw, i'm using PostgreSQL 9.0. Thank you. A: What about using temp tables? Another option is to create a refresh function (not a constraint!) on the table(s) of interest.

When you execute the query to refresh, you can leave the table(s) open, but immediately after the refresh, delete the data. For example, the following creates a function that looks at a table and deletes the contents. The table is not supposed to be deleted until a later time. -- Create the function CREATE OR REPLACE FUNCTION refresh_table() RETURNS TRIGGER LANGUAGE plpgsql AS $$ BEGIN -- Insert every row in the table FOR i IN 1..100 LOOP
